Finish Your Degree and Get a Teaching License—100% Online!

Over the past decade, the demographics of college students have changed dramatically and will continue to evolve as our societal needs and priorities shift. Higher education has had to pivot to provide access to new and shifting pockets of students.

More and more institutions have moved to online learning, and Western Colorado University (WCU) is no exception. Their new Adult Degree Completion plus teaching certificate program gives paraprofessionals the opportunity to finish their undergraduate degree and obtain a teaching license, all while staying employed in their existing jobs.

Dr. Terry Schliesman, Director, Adult Degree Completion, at WCU, said, "With our Adult Degree Completion program, we can better serve the estimated 800,000 Coloradans who have some college credits but have not finished their degree. It's been amazing—it really has—to evolve my role from traditional face-to-face professor to leading the effort to educate this newer student population."

With our Adult Degree Completion program, we can better serve the estimated 800,000 Coloradans who have some college credits but have not finished their degree.

Dr. Robert Fulton, State Coordinator of the Colorado Center for Rural Education, agrees that rural Coloradans desperately need access to higher education, especially online opportunities. "Lack of access to higher education comes up in nearly every meeting with school representatives in our rural communities," said Fulton.

Most future rural PK–12 educators live too far away from our colleges and universities to attend in person. Many of them have been attending institutions that are out of state, like Western Governors University or the University of Phoenix. That means they can't access stipends from the Colorado Department of Education or the Colorado Center for Rural Education. Fulton said, "To best serve our constituents, we have to give rural Coloradans access to public 100% online undergraduate education programs. One such exemplary program is the Adult Degree Completion program at Western Colorado University."

"We toured rural districts, and they consistently asked us for help getting paraprofessionals into the teacher pipeline," said Sherri Anderson, Director of Educator Preparation at WCU. "So we created this program where they could transfer credits, finish their bachelor's degree, and obtain a teaching license after completing a residency in their final year," Anderson said.

We toured rural districts, and they consistently asked us for help getting paraprofessionals into the teacher pipeline.

Another feature of this program is that learning is asynchronous. That means the students can maintain their existing paraprofessional positions while earning their degree, so they don't suffer a loss of income.

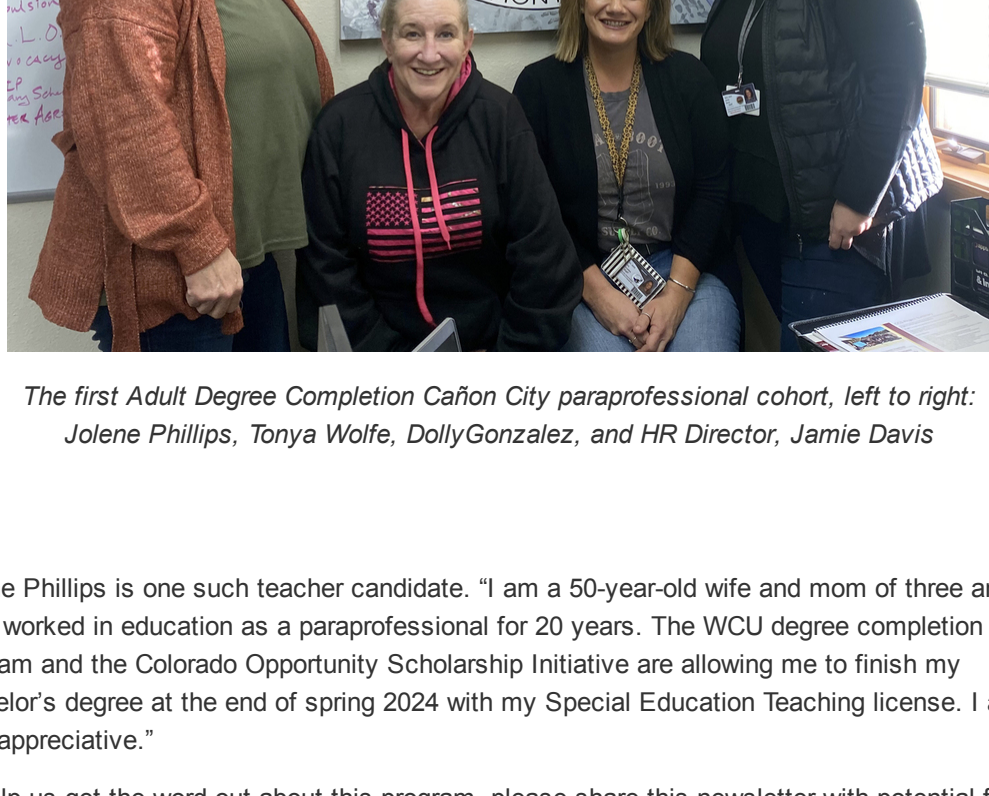

After eight months of operations, there are 35 students enrolled who are earning their bachelor's degree and teaching licensure in the WCU program. Ten of them are starting their one-year licensure unit (i.e., residency) this fall. A few interesting statistics:

- Average age of students: 40
- Average credit hours transferred: 65
- Average tuition discount (see explanation below): 85%

There are two scholarship opportunities that make this program financially feasible. First, WCU was awarded a multi-million-dollar, four-year grant from Colorado Opportunity Scholarship Initiative (COSI). "Ninety-seven percent of our students receive COSI scholarship funds, which brings down the tuition rate substantially," said Anderson.

Second, the Colorado Department of Education is offering a one-time $10,000 stipend to paraprofessionals seeking a bachelor's degree through the Educator Recruitment and Retention program. Recipients must agree to serve for three years in rural schools or shortage areas. Effectively, these students can finish their undergraduate degrees for just a few thousand dollars.

"I was a teacher for 14 years in rural schools," said Anderson. "I saw five paraprofessionals leave for other careers because they didn't see a realistic way to get a teaching license. Now there is a way. We can fill teaching positions with people who want to teach, know the families, and are tied to the community. This is the best way to serve our PK–12 students."

Jolene Phillips is one such teacher candidate. "I am a 50-year-old wife and mom of three and have worked in education as a paraprofessional for 20 years. The WCU degree completion program and the Colorado Opportunity Scholarship Initiative are allowing me to finish my bachelor's degree at the end of spring 2024 with my Special Education Teaching license. I am truly appreciative."

UNC Future Rural Teachers Summit Was a Success

More than 90 high school and community college students attended the Future Rural Teachers Summit on February 2, 2023, where they learned about what it would be like to teach in rural Colorado school districts. Colorado's 2022 Teacher of the Year, Autumn Rivera, gave the keynote address. Her message focused on the strength of community connections in rural areas.
